

M4-S8: Putting It All Together: Teaching English Language Learners

GK	Hello, Christina and hello listeners! Welcome to the eighth and final session in Module 4 of the TALE Academy, Putting It All Together: Teaching English Language Learners. This module’s mindset shift pushes us to leverage and regard the home languages of English language learners as instructional assets, assets that bridge prior knowledge to new knowledge and that ensure that content is meaningful and understandable to ELLs. Using ELLs’ home languages is not only an essential practice, it also fulfills our commitment to social justice that provides ELLs with equitable instruction and equitable assessments. Equitable assessment practices require us to provide scaffolds – including home languages, when appropriate – to more accurately understand what our students know about reading and content areas. Otherwise, by assessing only in English or without appropriate supports, we risk not having a full picture of what ELLs know and can do
CLH	Correct! And it all comes down to planning, of course. As teachers of both content and language, we plan deliberately to support the oral and written language development of our ELLs. We use comprehensible input to make lessons more accessible and meaningful for language learners. We scaffold their access to grade-level content and critical thinking tasks that will engage them cognitively as they learn the language. These strategies offer high expectations along with high levels of support. When we plan deliberately for ELLs to use their entire linguistic repertoires and their background knowledge, we create instructional spaces for ELLs to engage meaningfully with grade-level tasks and develop their oral and written language skills.
GK	So, spoiler, this session is really a grand review of the whole module. But personally I have to hear things several times before they connect, so here are some ideas of portable practices that work across learning environments while also promoting equity for our ELLs. <ul style="list-style-type: none">● Ensure all your students have access to devices, software, and the internet, if necessary. A recording of your screen with step-by-step instructions for using new tools, apps, or programs – with captions or translations in home languages – is useful for families.● Increase comprehensible input for ELLs by recording lessons and adding captions.● Increase engagement by incorporating students’ cultural assets. Try a survey to collect data to support your engagement efforts.● Increase participation and concept development by using home language strategies.

M4-S8: Putting It All Together: Teaching English Language Learners

	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ● Increase access to appropriate support services by conducting bilingual assessments. ● Make digital anchor charts that are portable across environments. ● Create – or have the students create – portable scaffolds, such as bilingual visual word walls, glossaries, and sentence stems for each unit. ● Select multimedia resources that have translations available and are representative of the diversity in the classroom and community. ● Identify multilingual school liaisons for each home language who may be available to record versions of key school information in their languages.
CLH	When planning for language, be careful not to reduce language and content goals to requiring ELLs to use only specific sentence starters, phrases, and key vocabulary. After teachers analyze lessons and units of study, vocabulary is often identified, deliberately organized, and scaffolded so that the language learner is pushed into using them within the lesson, orally and in writing. Requiring the ELL to use pre-selected vocabulary, phrases, and sentence frames can be helpful for their class participation in a new language, but it also takes away their agency from speaking and thinking in authentic ways. In order to make sure that our language scaffolding is not limiting, encourage students to be creative and use any authentic language or form of communication, such as drawing, models, and gestures, at any time. Focus on meaning.
CLH	Many educators consider translanguaging strategies as simply scaffolds for language learning, but they can play a more significant, central, agentic role for the language learner. Researcher and author Leo van Lier stated that the notion of scaffolds is rather “rigid and static” and that educational work is more dynamic and flexible. Scaffolds don’t always need to be heavily teacher-directed where the language learner plays a limited fill-in-the-blank type of role. Translanguaging and home language scaffolds can have powerful implications for the language learner; together they can create transformative spaces for the student to be an agent of their own learning. Students can also communicate when they need temporary scaffolds, such as word banks or sentence stems, and when they can be removed.
GK	It is important to remember that we teach students first, then language. Building relationships with students and finding their strengths are part of selecting the “just right” scaffolds for each classroom activity and assignment. If setting up

M4-S8: Putting It All Together: Teaching English Language Learners

	scaffolds is a formulaic process with preset places for student contributions, we miss out on students' voices and their highest-order thinking. Be careful not to over-scaffold content and prevent students from sharing original ideas that do not align with the sentence starters or key vocabulary. Language instruction cannot be about language in isolation – it must be about students engaging meaningfully and authentically with ideas that motivate them to fully deploy their linguistic repertoires. We must engage learners in great ideas that deserve the application of language.
CLH	Throughout this module, we have provided a number of strategies for educators serving multilingual and ELL students. Let us return to the principle of getting to know our students' backgrounds and prior knowledge. This allows us to affirm their identities as learners, bridge to new learning, and create a more equitable learning environment; this reinforces that the educator is a learner, as well. For example, when we ask students when or how they find translation tools helpful, some students may say that translation is a hindrance in the classroom, but that it provides a meaningful way to communicate with grandparents on WhatsApp, for example. This enables you to tailor your use of the tool and encourage it as a form of language maintenance and family connection.
GK	Here are some other ways to center ELLs in your instruction to create a more welcoming environment at the school or classroom level. Ask students to set individual growth targets in content learning, language, and personal development. Multilingual students may have specific goals for their first language. Set up a council or club for multilingual families or students to advise administration or educators. Initiate an Around the World Club where families and students share their cultures and learn about others while remembering that most of our ELLs were born in the U.S. Start an Equity and Social Justice Club with allies around the school. Let students set the agenda. Teach students how to advocate for themselves and ask questions. Let students take the lead in creating scaffolds, such as word banks, sentence stems, or visuals.
CLH	Ask students which scaffolds are “just right” for right now. When and in what circumstances can we remove them?

M4-S8: Putting It All Together: Teaching English Language Learners

	Ask ELLs if translation is a helpful tool. When? How? What resources do they need, if any? Ask ELLs if they are comfortable translating or interpreting for another student. Some students may not feel confident using their home language for grade-level learning. Others may simply not want to take time away from their work or to act as an ambassador each time. Have students select texts for the whole class that represent their backgrounds, identities, and experiences. Ensure that a variety of identities are represented in texts, pictures, and multimedia. Review texts and resources to ensure that they do not reinforce stereotypes or bias. Plan lessons that give students many opportunities to read, write, speak, and listen and that encourage the participation of all students. Finally, offer frequent comprehension checks, as well as opportunities for self-reflection and peer feedback on learning targets and goals.
GK	I guess we just have to keep asking ourselves: What other strategies have helped me to build rapport with my ELLs or to learn more about them? What helps me create a welcoming environment where ELLs thrive? Now it's your turn! Let's put it all together as you wrap up Module 4. In your workbook, you will have the opportunity to review a lesson that you recently taught and identify opportunities to embed supports for ELLs. The goal of the TALE Academy is to help teachers rethink education so that everyone – students, families, educators, school leaders, and communities – all have the opportunity to succeed. Through this module, you've gained a whole toolbox of ideas, strategies, and practices to help you better support ELLs across learning environments. Thanks for listening!